NEW PRESIDENT CARES LITTLE FOR SHOOTING

Magnificent Hunting Preserves Maintained by State for His Use.

BY LA MARQUE DE FONTENAY.
 FRANCE'S new president cares as little for shooting as did his predecessors, the murdered Sadi-Carnot and Thiers. If I draw attention to the fact, it is because shooting parties in the magnificent forest preserves that are maintained by the state for the use of the chief magistrate, and which swarm with game, constitute part and parcel of his recognized official hospitality to foreign sovereigns and royalties, to foreign ambassadors and to the leading French statesmen and official dignitaries.

Marshal MacMahon, Grevy, Casimir-Perier, Loubet, and Fallieres were all extremely fond of shooting, and very excellent shots. Fallieres, indeed, despite his emphysema, was so devoted to shooting that he gave up a considerable amount of time during the last month of his term of office to destroying perfect decoys of game in the state preserves—game which was sold for his personal benefit by Parisian game dealers.

President Carnot, at the first shooting party after his election in the Forest of Rambouillet, was so unfortunate as to accidentally pepper the then Colonel Brugere in the lower part of the back, Brugere almost succumbing to loss of blood before surgical attendance could be obtained. Carnot, ordinarily impassive, was almost beside himself with distress, and was anxious to have no further shooting parties. He was told, however, by the protocols or department of state etiquette, that it was obligatory upon him to continue the presidential shooting parties. So from that time forth he always shot with blank cartridges without even taking the trouble to sight his gun, knowing that under no circumstances could he possibly hit anything. Colonel Brugere, who had formed part of President Grevy's military household and had been slated for dismissal, benefited greatly by his wound; for Carnot felt it necessary not only to tone for his own awkwardness by retaining him on the military staff of the presidency, but to advance him at the earliest possible opportunity to the rank of general of brigade; from whence he rapidly rose to the post of generalissimo of the French army, from which he has now retired.

President Poincare, as I have already stated in these letters, has expressed his intention of declining to be directed and commanded by the protocols, and while he will doubtless continue the practice of giving presidential shooting parties, it is unlikely that he will consent to handling a gun and will content himself merely with the role of spectator.

This will satisfy his own tastes, and at the same time be construed as an act of particular courtesy towards his guests. For in England, in Germany and in Austria, when the sovereign honors a great noble by attending a shooting party, the host usually abstains from carrying any gun or doing any shooting himself, devoting himself entirely to providing the sport for his illustrious guest.

Perhaps there has been no French President who enjoyed these shooting parties more than Felix Faure, who towards the end of his term of office, after returning from St. Petersburg, where he has been received with almost imperial honors, had his head so turned that he insisted upon the revival of the ancient customs which prevailed at the court of Versailles and had the head gamekeeper call out "The cock for M. le President," just as in olden days his predecessors were wont to cry out, "The cock for His Majesty," when the King shouldered his gun, the idea being that no one else was to presume to shoot at the bird in question.

Of all the Nimrods among the royal rulers of Europe, the least sportsmanlike was the late King Leopold II. of Belgium, whose lameness rendered it uncomfortable and even painful for him to remain standing for any length of time, and he used accordingly to shoot seated in a comfortable arm chair, placed at the further end of a long avenue in the forest, up which the game was driven towards him by beaters. On the other hand, old Emperor Francis Joseph, considerably over eighty, even last autumn shot a chamois on the heights above Ischl, the chamois being a particularly shy game, which can only be reached by difficult stalking, of a very fatiguing and sometimes dangerous character.

The marriage, which has just taken place in Paris, of the Marquis de Blacas to Princess Marguerite de la Tremoille, serves to unite two of the great ducal houses of France. For the bridegroom is the only son and heir of the Duc de Blacas, who also possesses the Austrian title of prince by virtue of letters patent, issued by Emperor Francis a hundred years ago. The historic house of Blacas, one of the petty sovereign families of old Provence, became extinct in the male line direct through the death, in the beginning of the fourteenth century, of Baudouin de Blacas. The name, however, was revived by the crown in the person of Gaston de Soléilhac, grandson of Baudouin de Blacas by one of the latter's daughters, and from that time forth the family descended in the male line direct, until Pierre Louis de Blacas, who was one of the most devoted retainers of Louis XVIII. during the long years of his exile, also the chief of his household, and who on the Restoration was created a peer of France with the title of Duke of Blacas.

The duke was one of the chief personages of the reign of Louis XVIII. and of Charles X., and it was he who was appointed by the first of these two sovereigns to act as proxy for the Duc de Berry at the marriage at Naples of Princess Marie Louise of Two Sicilies. The princess therefore left Naples as full-fledged Duchess de Berry, as a French princess and as the legal wife of the French heir presumptive, though she had never set eyes upon him and did not meet him until she landed in France and was welcomed by him on the road to Paris.

Incidentally I may state that there is only one royal lady still living who was married by proxy, namely, the widowed ex-Queen of Naples, who was married by proxy at Munich, on the 8th of January, 1859, and did not set eyes upon her husband, afterwards Francis II., King of Naples, until just a month later, at Bari, in Italy.

The present Duke of Blacas is the grandson of the first duke, he, like his father before him, was one of the principal members of the household of that Comte de Chambord who reigned for twenty-four hours in his childhood as Henry V. of France, after the abdication of his grandfather, Charles X. In his favor in 1830, he represents in the Chamber of Deputies the Department of the Maine-et-Loire, in which his estate of Beaupreux is situated. His elder brother, whom he succeeded, was a Papal Zouave, and met with his death on the field of battle in one of the engagements between the papal forces and the Garibaldian armies in 1866.

With regard to the bride, Princess Marguerite de la Tremoille, she is the daughter of the eleventh Duke de la Tremoille and of Thourans, and owes her title of princess to the fact that by virtue of a decree of Louis XIV., all the children of the Dukes of La Tremoille are princes and princesses. The duke, her father, only succeeded to the family honors last year. He occupies a seat in the Chamber of Deputies, where his strange blend of royalism and socialism excites a good deal of attention. In many respects his socialism is of the most advanced and extreme type, while in other matters again his monarchical views are of the most reactionary character.

The duke is descended from a family who was one of the leaders of the First Crusade. He is married to the heiress of Count Frederic de Pillet-Will, owner of the vineyards producing the most royal of all French clarets, namely the Chateau Margaux, regent of the Bank of France, and one of the leading financiers and bankers of Paris. The grandfather of the duke was one of the pages of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, and a man of twenty at the time of their execution. Two of his brothers, that is to say, grand-uncles of the present duke, were guillotined during the days of the Terror.

IN UNCONSCIOUS CONDITION.

L. W. Cox Found at His Sawmill Seriously Injured.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]
 Galax, Va., February 22.—L. W. Cox, living six miles east of Galax, perhaps was fatally injured Thursday evening while working in his sawmill. The mill is run by water power, and it happened that there was no one in the mill but himself when the accident occurred. About 5 o'clock a member of the family found him lying in the mill practically unconscious, with his face badly cut and his lower jaw broken into pieces. At a late hour he had not sufficiently regained consciousness to be able to tell the story, though from indications it appears that the saw had accidentally caught a loose piece of lumber and hurled it off, striking him in the face. His condition is regarded as critical. He is married and has several children.

EXTEND DORMITORY SYSTEM.

Plans for Erection of Alumni Memorial Hall at Roanoke College.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]
 Salem, Va., February 22.—The alumni of Roanoke College have begun a movement for the erection of an alumni memorial hall. It is the plan to make this building, which will be in the form of a twin tower, accommodating about sixty students, an extension of the present dormitory system. This addition, which will cost between $20,000 and $30,000, will be the most imposing part of the dormitory group, as designed by Architect Rommel, of Philadelphia. To J. L. Lupton, class of '92, of Chattanooga, Tenn., belongs the honor of starting the fund with a generous subscription of $2,000. The alumni and former students who have agreed to organize the movement have chosen the method of laying the cornerstone, which will be done before every living alumnus through some classmate. The work of organization is already under way in forty classes. Almost every report of encouraging progress are received from the college. Many of the classes are already approaching the $500 mark. A significant fact is that one of the first subscribers to the movement was K. B. Surh, the first Korean graduate of Roanoke College, who is now in the Chinese maritime customs service in Manchuria. Friends of the college will learn with interest that one of the most generous subscriptions has come from Dr. Julius D. Dreher, ex-president of Roanoke, who is now American consul to Jamaica.

The contract for the building will probably be let in March, which will insure its completion by the opening of the next school year.

INSURANCE MEN ORGANIZE.

Local Underwriters' Association Formed in Roanoke.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]
 Roanoke, Va., February 22.—A meeting of the Roanoke life insurance men was held Friday evening at the offices of the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York in Roanoke for the purpose of organizing a local underwriters' association. The officers of the association were elected, and a committee was made temporary chairman, and Karl Gregoire was made temporary secretary. The meeting was largely attended and a broad field of interest was shown in the movement. A committee, consisting of Messrs. Huff, Dyer and Byers, was appointed to look into the matter of permanent officers for the association. This committee will make their report at the next meeting, which will be held February 23, at which time complete organization is contemplated.
